It could be great to add an option where I can eject the drive without the application having to ask. Right now it needs to be done manually. I'm not sure that the Windows 7 disc ejecting routine requires you to have the case open (unless you have a disc tray with a mechanism that retracts the tray after the tray is ejected). Anyways, here is a proof-of-concept video of a utility I wrote in C# (F#, using Mono, if that makes any difference) to eject the drive: It could be great to add an option where I can eject the drive without the application having to ask. Right now it needs to be done manually. I don't know if it can be done without the application asking or not. But you can always just put in a command-line argument to eject it yourself. Anyway, this utility may help in any case. You can see it ejects and closes the case too. I don't know if it can be done without

- Copying of audio or data CD's and DVD's can take up to 30% of the whole time of a single copying session. - Unwanted I/O interrupts may slow down your computer and cause other applications to hang. - A long CD copy will reduce the life of the CD / DVD drive's motor. - When transferring CD or DVD data to your hard drive or PC with a slow SATA / USB / FireWire interface, it will take a long time to transfer. - A long CD copy may also reduce the life of the CD / DVD drive. - During a copying session, if the disk becomes unreadable, it will require a lot of work to recover it. - It may be difficult to eject a CD that is still being written. - When writing to your hard drive, if it becomes full, some of the write data will be skipped. This means your computer will fail to write when you eject the disk, and will result in data loss. - It is difficult to use CD -R/RW disks. - Unwanted ejection of a CD or DVD can be really annoying. FastEject Solution: FastEject can be used to eject CDs or DvDs faster than your usual method. In addition to auto ejecting and pause/resume, FastEject can also eject any incomplete CDs or DvDs that you are currently writing to. Some examples: CD Copy: - When copying a music CD, you can eject the CD after the music is finished. - It does not take a lot of time to copy a whole music CD, but it takes a lot of time to copy music with fast speed. - This method is the best when you are copying to your hard drive. - FastEject also has an option to pause the copying and resume it later. This method is useful when your hard drive is full and you want to eject the disk first. CD -R/RW: - With CD-R/RW disks, FastEject can be used to eject the disk, even if it is still being written to. - It is very difficult to use CD -R/RW disks with fast copying speeds. - FastEject solves this problem and can be used to eject a CD that is still being written to. CD -RW: - FastEject can be used to eject CD-RW disks that you are currently writing

What's New in the?

The Eject button is often pressed inadvertently when you are reading information on the CD, such as song titles, artist name, composer, album title, etc. For example, you are a musician who wants to reorder the artist's and album title in a compilation CD you have prepared. You press the "Play" button to start reading, and the CD player fails to start or to display the readout information. Then you hit the Eject button accidentally and the CD starts to be ejected. Sometimes, the Eject button does not work as intended. You see the CD is not ejected but the disc tray is closed or the drive unit is off. The Eject button fails to respond even if the power is off. You press and hold the Eject button, expecting that the tray will eject the CD. Then the tray unexpectedly opens and the CD exits without ejecting. If a CD which was being ejected is in the tray when the power is off, there is no problem. The problem only occurs when there is a malfunction of the eject button function. A user may press and hold the Eject button to eject the CD and accidentally open the tray. Sometimes, an error message is displayed on the screen saying that the operation is not possible. It happens when the CD has not been ejected after several repeated eject operations. How to use: In the DVD-RAM drive, there is a DVD Eject button on the front panel of the drive. The DVD Eject button can be used in the same manner as the CD Eject button. Features: The CD Eject button feature is based on KEX and can be used with most CD/DVD drives. It is integrated with a DVD/CD AutoEject feature. The AutoEject feature can automatically eject a DVD/CD when a read operation is performed or the drive is off. To open the tray, press the DVD Eject button and hold the button for a while. The tray automatically opens and the CD/DVD is ejected. Requirements: When the Eject button is used, the DVD player needs to be turned off. Notes: To control the AutoEject feature, you need to be careful to use the same drive configuration as before. When you use the AutoEject feature, the eject operation may be performed when you press the Eject button in the drive which is OFF. For example, when you use the AutoEject feature, you should use the DVD-RAM drive which is ON. If you use the DVD-RW drive which is OFF, you can eject a DVD/CD by manually pressing the Eject button.
